PLAIN COMMON SENSE.—Mr. Discaeli was studiously moderate and un-oratorical in the speech which he made on the 25th of February in explanation of the Reform resolutions. In spite of the power which he has at his command of peroruting brilliantly, he concluded his speech in the following plain practical words:-I have now fulfilled my task. I told hon, members who made inquiries since the time when the Resolutions were laid on the table that I had taken a note of them, and that at the proper time I would explain to the House the an which the Government recommended should be given to the principles expressed in the Resolutions. I trust that the House will caudidly consider the observations I have made. It will be our duty on the passing of the Resolutions to stroduce a Bill, and I think that its provisions number of voters belonging to the working lasses. I hope, therefore, it will be fairly consiten of late that it, might lead to angry recri have brought forward a sincere Bill, which they which I carnestly hope will be backed by the good feeling of an united people.
